We should not contemplate whether values should be taught at schools or not. What we should consider is the kind of values that schools ought to teach.

First of all, the most important values are those that mold a sound personality who can cooperate with other people for the promotion of a better society. Altruism, cooperative spirit, respect to other people, dignity, honesty and determination to work hard are some essential virtues the foundations of which are laid at home when children are still very young. Some years later, school comes to cultivate the above-mentioned virtues in an environment that prepares students to enter society. How could school be effective in this process? This could be achieved by truly imitating society, that is by setting rules and assigning group activities. For example, environmental or debate groups and school elections can prove to be very educational in terms of values.

Finally, having been a student for many years, I can tell that school environment has had a great impact on my character. In conclusion, school can definitely inspire students to become healthy personalities who will then be members of a healthy society.
