ΘΕΜΑ Γ

Dear Editor,

I recently read Joel Stein's article on millennials and, being a millennial myself, I decided to write in order to express my opinion.

To begin with, I strongly disagree with the writer describing millennials as lazy and less educated. On the contrary, our generation proves to be more hard-working and better educated than older generations. Not only do we try hard to get accepted into university, but we have to keep working and studying hard for the rest of our lives as today's job market is very competitive. Nowadays, unpropitious economic situation causes many millennials to face unemployment despite their being highly qualified.

On the other hand, although we have to tackle many problems, we never lose hope and we develop strategies to find solutions. Moreover, the writer is right when he says that our generation is accepting. Having become familiar with technology from a young age and having access to a large amount of information, we are aware of today's social problems, which makes us open-minded and tolerant of diversity.

Finally, it is obvious that the writer does not belong to the millennial generation. However, I feel that millennials should not be severely criticized.

Yours sincerely,

Alex Georgiou
